Construction Simulator: Beat Elite by incorporating a mesh and. more than half finished.The present invention generally relates to electroacoustic transducers and, more particularly, to an improved electroacoustic transducer which is capable of being driven to a high acoustic output while maintaining a relatively low peak power consumption. High peak power demand requirements, combined with limited internal cooling resources, are the primary impediments to the continued development of miniature high power electroacoustic transducers. All electronic components, including transducers, must be designed to dissipate less power than the power they consume in order to ensure a long product lifetime. The need for lower power is an absolute requirement in the design of electronic equipment. The demand for lower power is particularly pronounced with regard to miniature electronic equipment, due to the ever increasing demands on power and power density. Furthermore, as more electronic devices are miniaturized, less space is available for routing cabling and cooling air. Thus, there is a need for an electroacoustic transducer which is capable of having a high electrical output power, and which also can achieve a relatively high acoustic output. The high electrical output is achieved through the use of a relatively high voltage pulse or square wave source input. It is, therefore, necessary to have an electroacoustic transducer which is capable of dissipation power. Although the peak power demand of the transducer may be relatively high, the average power demand, i
